IS THE WOLF CUNNING?

No, Merely a Coward, and Not a Patch on the Fox.

"A great many persons claim the wolf s as cunning as the fox," said Mr. A. J. Meleod, Hudson's Bay factor at Flying Post, "but he is not; he is merely owardly. I had an argument with a gentleman on the train on my way to New York, he claiming that the wolf approaches and in some respects equals he fox in shrewdness and cunning. There was an old foxnear the post that I had tried in every way to catch, but always failed."

Mr. McLeod chuckled heartily, and I fancy this was over the memory of the final taking off of Bre'r Fox, since he employed the past tense in referring to that sly old rascal. Then he went on to say that he tried hiding a baitless trap in the snow near the baited one, covering the second and even a third trap with leaves, &c., until he, exasperated, was almost at his wits' end, for all of these the fox religiously avoided. At last Mr. McLeod tried another experiment, placing the tempting bait on the ground with an empty trap, carefully set, just over it. In another place he et a second trap in the same way, and with impatience awaited the coming another day. The fox visited both traps during the night, and in each case he began to dig in the snow some two feet away from the trap, approaching it so at last the bait fell into the cutting, leaving the trap across its end, and he backed out in good order."-Forest and
